Recent Agency Developments as of July 23, 2021

- On July 21, 2021, the FTC unanimously adopted a policy statement regarding repair restriction imposed by manufacturers and sellers, consistent with the EO's directive to evaluate such restrictions. The FTC indicated that it will devote more enforcement resources to combat practices by manufacturers that impede third-party and self repair—previously a low priority. In describing this new priority, the FTC referred to a 2019 report titled “Nixing the Fix” that identified several practices that could unjustifiably restrict competition for repair services. Several of the practices that the FTC highlighted in its policy statement include: overbroad assertion of patent and trademark rights; use of technical measures—such as software locks or digital rights management—or legal measures—such as end-user license agreements—to prevent access to technology beyond what is necessary to protect underlying intellectual property rights; and limiting the availability of inputs to the repair process such as replacement parts, software tools, or service manuals.

- Consistent with the new priority placed on repair restrictions, the FTC policy statement stated that it would step up enforcement of the Magnuson-Moss Warranty Act and its implementing regulations by, among other things, potentially filing suits for injunctive relief, closely monitoring private litigation to determine whether the Commission to investigate or to file an amicus brief, and by exploring rulemaking. The Commission also stated that it would scrutinize repair restrictions for unlawful tying arrangements, refusals to deal, exclusive dealing, or exclusionary design provisions that may violate the Sherman Act or Section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, and would review “any material claims made to purchasers and users” for deceptive acts or practices that could violate Section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act.
- The FTC’s increased focus on the “right to repair” serves as a warning that companies should review their policies and practices regarding third-party and user repairs, including striving for precision in developing their strategies for protecting their intellectual property, to ensure an adequate balance between protection and compliance with competition laws. This also may portend opportunities for those who wish to offer repair services that were otherwise restricted by overbroad protective measures.

- Reinforce the long-standing Department of Agriculture interpretation that it is unnecessary under the Packers and Stockyards Act to demonstrate industry-wide harm to establish a violation of the Act and that the "unfair, unjustly discriminatory, or deceptive" treatment of one farmer, the giving to one farmer of an "undue or unreasonable preference or advantage," or the subjection of one farmer to an "undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage in any respect" violates the Act;
- Prohibit unfair practices related to grower ranking systems — systems in which the poultry companies, contractors, or dealers exercise extraordinary control over numerous inputs that determine the amount farmers are paid and require farmers to assume the risk of factors outside their control, leaving them more economically vulnerable;

Federal Trade Commission Developments & Analysis

- On July 21, 2021, the FTC unanimously adopted a policy statement regarding repair restriction imposed by manufacturers and sellers, consistent with the EO's directive to evaluate such restrictions. The FTC indicated that it will devote more enforcement resources to combat practices by manufacturers that impede third-party and self repair—previously a low priority. In describing this new priority, the FTC referred to a 2019 report titled “Nixing the Fix” that identified several practices that could unjustifiably restrict competition for repair services. Several of the practices that the FTC highlighted in its policy statement include: overbroad assertion of patent and trademark rights; use of technical measures—such as software locks or digital rights management—or legal measures—such as end-user license agreements—to prevent access to technology beyond what is necessary to protect underlying intellectual property rights; and limiting the availability of inputs to the repair process such as replacement parts, software tools, or service manuals.
- Consistent with the new priority placed on repair restrictions, the FTC policy statement stated that it would step up enforcement of the Magnuson-Moss Warranty Act and its implementing regulations by, among other things, potentially filing suits for injunctive relief, closely monitoring private litigation to determine whether the Commission to investigate or to file an amicus brief, and by exploring rulemaking. The Commission also stated that it would scrutinize repair restrictions for unlawful tying arrangements, refusals to deal, exclusive dealing, or exclusionary design provisions that may violate the Sherman Act or Section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, and would review “any material claims made to purchasers and users” for deceptive acts or practices that could violate Section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act.
- The FTC's increased focus on the “right to repair” serves as a warning that companies should review their policies and practices regarding third-party and user repairs, including striving for precision in developing their strategies for protecting their intellectual property, to ensure an adequate balance between protection and compliance with competition laws. This also may portend opportunities for those who wish to offer repair services that were otherwise restricted by overbroad protective measures.
